

The background is a detailed illustration of a farm scene at sunset or sunrise. A small, fluffy tabby kitten with orange and brown stripes and white paws is in the foreground, looking up towards the right. To its right, the head and neck of a large brown horse with a white blaze on its face are visible, looking down at the kitten. In the background, there is a wooden barn, a fence, and trees, all bathed in the warm, golden light of the low sun.

Tiny Paws, Big Hooves

Kim Pressacco

Tiny Paws, Big Hooves
by Kim Pressacco

Copyright 2026 Kim Pressacco
All rights reserved.

This book was created with Whoka Story Studio.

Harvey had wobbly beginnings.

His back legs bent a little sideways, and when he walked, he waddled forward like a tiny gorilla.

Plop. Step. Plop.

On each paw, Harvey had six toes. Six small toes that spread wide when he stepped.

Sometimes he tripped over them.

A person with a long braid, wearing a light shirt and dark vest, is kneeling on a dirt path. They are reaching out with their hands towards a small, striped tabby kitten. The kitten is standing on the path, looking up at the person. In the background, there is a wooden barn, a fence, and a bright sunrise over a field. A semi-transparent white box with text is overlaid on the image.

But Harvey never complained. Not once.
Each sunrise, the stewards of the land
knelt beside him.
Gentle hands. Patient voices.

Kim stretched one little leg. Then the other. "Strong toes," she whispered. "Strong heart. " Harvey purred the whole time. He didn't fuss.

He didn't frown. He simply tried again. Wobble. Stretch. Try again. And slowly... The wobble grew smaller. Days passed.

The tiny gorilla walk became a careful kitten walk. The careful kitten walk became a steady little stride.

No image yet

One morning, Harvey trotted across the barn floor. No plop. No tumble. Just paws on wood. Light and sure. The stewards smiled.

No image yet

“You’re growing strong,” they said. Harvey hadn’t noticed the change. He had just kept trying. The farm was full of big things.

No image yet

Big sheep with woolly coats. Big dogs with booming barks.
And the biggest of all— Marlin.

No image yet

Marlin was strong and handsome, with a shiny dark brown coat that sparkled in the sunlight.

No image yet

Down the center of his face ran a bold white blaze— like a streak of moonlight painted just for him.

No image yet

His hooves pressed steadily into the earth. Harvey looked up. And up. And up. “I am very small,” he whispered.

No image yet

The animals didn't mean to be unkind. Bella barked as she ran past him. The sheep shuffled in big woolly clusters.

No image yet

One lamb blinked at Harvey and said, “You’re the size of my ear! ” Harvey tried to laugh. But sometimes, Being tiny felt heavy.

No image yet

One warm afternoon, the barn was quiet. Sunlight slipped through the wooden boards, painting golden stripes across the floor.

No image yet

The round hay bales stood tall and heavy, stacked in careful rows. A curious little lamb wandered inside.

No image yet

She squeezed between two hay bales— just a little too far. The space shifted. “Baa baa! ” she cried. The opening was narrow.

No image yet

Too tight for dogs. Too tall and close for hooves. Marlin stepped forward, His great body fills the doorway.

No image yet

But the bales left no room. Bella barked. Dust swirled in the light. Everything felt big. Everything felt loud. Harvey stood very still.

No image yet

He looked at the towering stacks. He looked at the small gap.
He looked at his paws. Six toes on each one. Small. Wide.

No image yet

Steady. His heart beat fast. Not afraid. Focused. Harvey stepped toward the bales. He placed one paw carefully on the rough hay twine.

No image yet

His six toes spread wide, gripping and holding. He climbed. Careful. Balanced. Sure. He remembered his early steps. The wobble. The practice. Tiny squeeze.

No image yet

Tiny turn. “Baa baa,” the lamb cried softly. “I’m here,” Harvey whispered. “Follow my voice. ” Slowly, the lamb backed out.

No image yet

Harvey guided her one small step at a time. And then— They were free. The lamb bounded toward the flock.

No image yet

The barn grew quiet again. Marlin lowered his great head. His breath warmed Harvey's fur. "You were exactly the right size," Marlin said.

No image yet

Harvey blinked. “I was? ” Marlin’s white blaze glowed in the dusty light. “Too big, and you could not fit.

No image yet

Too small in spirit, and you would not have tried. ” Harvey looked down at his paws. They were straight now. Strong. Sure.

No image yet

“That was my practice phase,” he said softly. Marlin nodded. “Every steady stride has a beginning. ” The next morning, the sun rose gently over the pasture. Harvey stretched— not because he had to... but because he liked to. He stepped forward. No wobble. No plop. Just quiet confidence. He padded across the field. Marlin walked beside him. Dark coat shining. White blaze bright as moonlight. Big hooves. Tiny paws. Side by side. Harvey did not look up anymore. He did not look down. He simply walked. And for the first time, He felt perfectly sized.

A warm, golden-hour illustration of a horse and a cat in a field. The horse, with a white blaze on its face, is on the right, looking down. The cat, a tabby, is in the foreground, looking up. The background shows a field with a barn and trees under a sunset sky.

A warm picture-book story brought to life in Whoka Story Studio.